MOOD: 😬 apocalyptic

MUSIC: Andrew Bird - MX Missiles

In precisely one hour, a nuclear holocaust will obliterate life as we know it.

And the survivors will be hunted down by an army of killer robots.

So if you were putting off getting that beer, now would be the time.

Dude! I found a place I must take you on your hypothetical vacation visit to Seattle!

The old water tower in Volunteer Park (and the park itself is a joy, originally landscaped by the Olmstead Brothers) has an outer wall that the friend who took me there described as "climber porn". All broken-ish brick with all kinds of jutting bits and cracks and crevices. I meant to take a picture of the surface, but I forgot after making the climb up to the top and then down again. But it's neat enough that I thought about it for a moment, and a climber I most emphatically am not.

Oo, and I know a great little cafe only a few blocks away. And the park has gorgeous lawns and views and a beautiful glass greenhouse with lots of exotics and the Asian Art Museum with camels out front and awesome ironwork (hang on, that I have a pic of):

You totally need to come back to Seattle when you have time.

Any number of friends of mine have commented on this, but the coda about the beer makes yours better!

Apparently we all have the date wrong. I just found out on Twitter that it's just self-awareness tonight; Apocalypse Thursday.

Heh. If it's anything like the software at work, our new robotic overlords will have a systems crash within a few minutes, and we can hold off the revolution indefinitely by sending them to the IT tech line.

Whatever. It's an excuse for Guinness on a weeknight.

Funny, isn't it, how Judgment Day keeps getting pushed back later and later as the franchise ages?

On the other hand, celebrating Patriots Day with a nice cold beer is a fine tradition indeed. One might even call it the patriotic duty of every Federal employee.

Yum.
